ABN AMRO: the facts

Group Chief Executive John Varley announced the terms of a proposed merger with Dutch banking group ABN AMRO on Monday, 23 April 2007. The Board of ABN AMRO and the Board of Barclays have both recommended the proposed merger to their respective shareholders. Colleagues can find all the latest information about the proposed merger on the Barclays Group Intranet, including communications from John Varley and media coverage which is updated throughout the day. But many colleagues will be curious to know more about Barclays proposed merger partner. Here is our quick guide to ABN AMRO.

ABN AMRO calls itself an international bank with European roots. Those roots go back to 1824, when a decree of King Willem I established the Netherlands Trading Society in The Hague. The bank kept that name until 1964 when, after a merger, it became Algemene Bank Nederland (General Bank of the Netherlands) or ABN. On merging with Amro (Amsterdam-Rotterdam) Bank in 1991, it became ABN AMRO. ABN AMRO now ranks eighth in Europe and 13th in the world, based on total assets. It has more than 4,500 branches in 53 countries, more than 105,000 employees (full-time equivalents) and had assets worth 987bn (£658bn) as at 31 December 2006. Profits rose by 7.6 per cent to 4,780m (£3,187m) in 2006.

Strategy

ABN AMRO's main focus is on the mid-market. In personal banking, this means customers who require more than a basic banking package (mass affluent and private clients), but who don't yet fall into the category of top-end private clients. The commercial mid-market ranges from medium-sized companies in the Netherlands to a smaller number of large multinational clients and financial institutions. But the bank believes that it must continue to serve both the top end of the market and the mass retail market to ensure success.

Customers

ABN AMRO focuses on consumer and commercial clients in its local markets and on selected multinational corporations and financial institutions, as well as private clients, globally. It is active in four main customer segments: Personal Banking, Private Banking, Business and Commercial, and Corporate and Institutional. Although it serves a broad range of customers, its strategic focus is on the mid-market, where it believes it has a strong and distinctive competitive advantage.

Organisation

ABN AMRO is managed through a series of business units (BUs) which are responsible for distinct regions, customer segments and product segments. Five regional BUs cover the Netherlands, Europe, North America, Latin America and Asia. They serve about 20 million personal customers and small to larger businesses. Customers with global needs are served by two BUs. Private Clients provides private banking services to wealthy individuals and families and manages 142bn (£47bn) worth of assets (at 31 December 2006). Global Clients serves 550 multinational customers. There are three product BUs: Global Markets, Transaction Banking and Asset Management. Global Markets develops products for commercial customers, while Transaction Banking offers payments and trade products for retail, private client and commercial markets. ABN AMRO Asset Management, a world leader, operates from more than 20 locations worldwide and manages 193bn (£130bn) worth of assets for private investors and institutional clients (at 31 December 2006).

Corporate responsibility

ABN AMRO's name for corporate responsibility is sustainable banking. It says sustainability is moving into the mainstream of its objective as a business, which is to create and maximise sustainable value for all its stakeholders. We take social, ethical and environmental factors into consideration when providing financial services, ABN AMRO says. Sustainability is integrated into ABN AMRO's business at Managing Board level, at Group level and in the business units (BUs). Each BU has a dedicated sustainability team that works closely with a Sustainability Department at head office. Sustainability activities are also being integrated into the Group functions.
